Driverless trucks may be coming to California roads. Here's how to weigh in

"While California has allowed the testing of light duty autonomous vehicles since 2019, until now, the state has not allowed autonomous cars above 10,000 pounds on the roads. That said, it has welcomed fleets of smaller vehicles like Waymo robo-taxis, which weigh about half that much.

The state's driverless vehicle regulations use a multi-phase permitting process for testing and operating autonomous vehicles:

First, manufacturers must get a permit for testing with a safety driver.

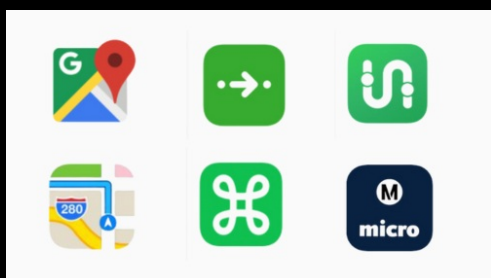

Next, a driverless testing permit.

Then, a deployment permit, to send its trucks onto the freeway.

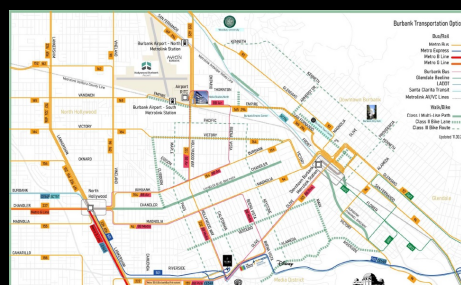

According to the state's motor vehicle department, there are more than 30 manufacturers testing light duty autonomous vehicles with drivers, six companies testing without a driver and three already authorized to operate."
